Adjust (ădʒə·st), v. [a. 16th c. Fr. adjuste-r (now ajuster). The OFr. ajuster, ajoster, ajouster = It. aggiustare, aggiostare (:—late L. adjuxtāre), gave rise to a med. L. adjustare, which was naturally, though erroneously, taken as a derivative of ad + justus, and so consciously used. After Fr. ajouster became ajouter, so that its formal relationship to aggiustare and adjustare was lost sight of, a new Fr. adjuster was formed after the latter, and received those senses of ajouster, which seemed to approach to L. justus, Fr. juste. In It. and Sp. also the mod. sense of aggiustare, ajustar, has been influenced by association with justus. Thus mod. Fr. ajuster may be viewed as a refashioning or re-forming of OFr. ajouster:—adjuxtāre, after à + juste. See also AJOUST.]

Also 3 admirald, 5 amireld; 4 ameraunt, 7 admirant. [a. OFr., ad. Arab. directly, or through med. L. or some other Rom. lang. The Arabic أَمِير amīr commander, (f. أَمَرَ amara, to command, order,) commonly Englished AMEER, EMIR, occurs in many titles followed by -al- '(of) the,' as in amīr-al-umarā ruler of rulers, amīr-al-mā commander of the water, amīr-al-bahr, commander of the sea, the earliest of which is amīr-al-mūminīn commander of the faithful, assumed by the Caliph Omar, and Latinized in many forms by the early chroniclers (see Amir mumnes in Du Cange). As amīr is constantly followed by -al- in all such titles, amīr-al- was naturally assumed by Christian writers as a substantive word, and variously Latinized as amir-ālis, -allus, -ālius, -ārius, OFr. amiral, -ail, -aill, -ayl, Pr. amiraus, amirar, amiralh, Pg. amiralh, It. amiraglio. But as is usual with foreign words, popular etymology was soon at work on these original forms, assimilating them to more familiar words, (1) by treating the am- as = Fr. and Pr. ame- :—L. adm-, and refashioning it accordingly as med. L. admir-ālis, -allus, -ālius, -ārius, OFr. admiral, -ail; (2) by assimilating it to other Arabic words in al- (which probably began in Spain) as med. L. almirallus, OSp. almiralle, almirage, It. almiraglio, OFr. almiral, -ail; (3) by assimilating the ending to familiar Teutonic or Romance suffixes, as med. L. amir-aldus, OFr. amirail, -ault, -aut (after names like Reginald), Sp. almirante (? after imperante), OFr. amirant, admirant; (4) by confusing the refashioned forms in adm- with derivatives of L. admīrāri to wonder at, whence med. L. admīrābilis ('Rex Africæ qui dicitur vulgariter admirabilis mundi'), admīrandus, admīrātus (these again with the initial variations am-, amm-, alm-), whence Pr. amirats, OFr. amiret, amiré, amirauble, amiraſle, amirand, etc., etc. In Eng. the chief form represents OFr. amiral, -ayl, reduced in 16th c. by phonetic gradation to amrel, a pronunciation still common with sailors. But the refashioned admirale, -ail occurs as early as 1205, and became regular after 1500 as the literary form. Variants in -ald, -aunt, after med. L. amiraldus, and OFr. amirant, are also found in ME. As in the other languages the original meaning was 'Emir, Saracen commander, ruler under the Caliph or Sultan'; the modern maritime use is due to the office of amīr-al-bahr or amīr-al-mā 'Ameer of the sea' (Sp. almirante de la mar), created by the Arabs in Spain and Sicily, continued by the Christian kings of Sicily, and adopted successively by the Genoese, French, and English under Edward III as 'Amyrel of the Se,' or 'admyrall of the navy.' After the original use became obsolete about 1500, admiral was used in the naval sense, without any qualification, as an English title.]

L. āvertere to turn away, Avert, also made OFr. avertir, which had thus all the senses 'turn to, turn away, remark, call attention.' In 14–16th c. avertir, when answering to L. advertere, was often written advertir; and, since Caxton, advert and avert have been distinguished in Eng. Mod. Fr. has avertir (Palsg. and Cotgr. advertir) only in the sense of 'call the attention of another, admonish' (one of the senses of L. advertere). The lengthened stem of this, a(d)vertiss-, has given Eng. Advertise, orig. a synonym of advert, but subseq. differentiated, so that advert retains the sense of 'turn one's own attention,' advertise that of 'direct the attention of others.' Advert, advertise, avert, are thus all immediately from OFr. avertir, avertiss-ant.]

Æ (usually written as a digraph or ligature, but also, and in the earliest times, separately ae) was in OE. the symbol of a simple vowel, intermediate between a and e. When short, as in glæd, fæder, it represented orig. Teut. short a, and had the power of modern Eng. a in man, glad; when long, as in sæ, flæsc, the same sound prolonged, as in a common American pronunciation of bear, hair, there. After 1100 the short æ was generally replaced by a (though sometimes by e); the long æ continued to be written æ in the 12th and early 13th c., the OE. ea passing into the same sound and symbol, but in the development of ME. this symbol died out, and was replaced by simple e or ee. Thus OE. sæ, flæsc, eðr, eðst are in Ormin and Layamon sæ, flæsh, ær, æst, but afterwards se(e, flesh, ere, eest. The symbol æ, which thus disappeared from the language in 13th c., was re-introduced in 16th c. in forms derived from Latin words with æ, and (this being the Latin symbolization of Greek αι) Greek words in αι; as ædify, æther. But this æ had only an etymological value, and whenever a word became thoroughly English, the æ or ae was changed into simple e as edify, ether. The æ or ae now remains, only (1) in Greek and Lat. proper names as in Æneas, Cæsar; even these, when familiar, often take e as Judea, Etna. (2) In words belonging to Roman or Gr. Antiquities as ædile, ægis. (3) In scientific or technical terms as ætiology, æstivation, phænogamous, Athenæum; these also when they become popularized take e, as phenomenon, Lyceum, museum, era.

Æ initial is thus to be looked upon as an earlier spelling of E, and will here occur only (1) in EE. words that became obsolete, before changing to e, as æ law (OE. ǽ), æ river (OE. ea); (2) in words directly adopted or formed from Latin and Greek which became obsolete before changing to e as ædituate; or have not changed to e because they indicate ancient things as ædile, ægis, or are technical as ægilops, ægrotant, ætiology. All other words will be found under their later form in E.

(In many modern books the digraph æ is regularly resolved as ae; when this is done, dissyllabic ae ought to be printed aë: thus either ægis, aereal, or aëgis, aëreal; but simple ae is often used in both.

As to pronunciation usage differs. The analogy of the language, the practice of orthoepists, and the alternate spelling with e, are in favour of æ being treated precisely like e in the same position. But there is a strong tendency with classical scholars (at variance with their practice as to other long L. and Gr. vowels) to make it long (ī) in all positions. This influences popular usage to some extent, so long as æ is written; as soon as e takes its place, natural English habits prevail: cf. ætivate, ætuary, estuary.

Comb. æw-breche, EAU-BRECHE, adultery.

Ae (ē), mod. Sc. form of northern ME. a, OE. án, one, used adjectively. See A adj.[1]

In ME. and early Sc., a was used bef. a cons., an, ane, bef. a vowel, and absolutely; in mid. Sc. ane was used in all positions and constructions; in mod. Sc. ae (the Sc. spelling of final a long) is used bef. a sb. however beginning, ane only absolutely: 'he has ae hand, only ane.'

Æ-, pref. The stress form of OE. a- (see A- pref. 1) used with sbs. and adjs., the unaccented a- being used with verbs. Meaning: out, off, onward, away; hence, from idea of doing away, a privative = un-, -less. Thus æ-fyrmða washings off, ablutions, æ-gilde without payment, æ-mód out of his mind, æ-scære unshorn, without tonsure, æ-rist arising, æ-cumba what is combed off, oakum. Only a few examples survived in ME. as e-rede unadvised, e-rist, a-rist rise. The West Germ. dialects had two forms answering to Goth. us- (ur-): viz. OHG. ar-, OE. or- with sbs. and adjs.; OHG. ar-, er-, ir-, mod. G. er-, OE. ar- (rarely preserved), a- with vbs., é- with sbs. and adjs. This æ- represented an earlier ā- for ar- (æ-mód = ā-mód = ar-mód, like strǽte = WGer. strâte). Ær- reappears in Layamon in ær-wene, ær-witte (where it may be due to a mixture of OE. æ- and or-).

-æ (-ī) pl. suffix of L. nouns of 1st decl. in -a, and romanized form of Gr. -αι pl. of nouns in -ᾱ, -ᾰ, -ᾱς, -αι. Retained in Eng. in words not naturalized or merely in technical use, as alæ, laminæ, larvæ, nebulæ, striæ. Esp. in proper names of cl. antiquity, as Heraclidæ, and modern names of orders and families of animals and plants as Felidæ, Falconidæ, Geometridæ, Leguminosæ, Rosaceæ, Rosidæ, Roseæ. In other words it varies with the Eng. form in -as, as actiniæ or actinias; or is retained only in technical senses as mathematical formulæ, theological formulæ. In all words thoroughly popularized it yields to -a, as in arenas, areas, auroras, hyænas, fuchsias, calceolarias, Floras, Faunas, Julias, Marias, Cleopatras, the two Americas.

Æsthetic (ɛsþe·tik: see below), a. and sb.; also esthetic. [mod. ad. Gr. αἰσθητικ-ός, of or pertaining to αἰσθητά, things perceptible by the senses, things material (as opposed to νοητά things thinkable or immaterial), also 'perceptive, sharp in the senses'; f. vb. stem αἰσθε- 'feel, apprehend by the senses.' Applied in Germ. by Baumgarten (1750–58, Æsthetica) to 'criticism of taste' considered as a science or philosophy; against which, as a misuse of the word found in German only, protest was made by Kant (1781, Crit. R. V. 21), who applied the name, in accordance with the ancient distinction of αἰσθητά and νοητά, to 'the science which treats of the conditions of sensuous perception,' a sense retained in the Kantian philosophy, and found in English c 1800. But Baumgarten's use of æsthetik found popular acceptance, and appeared in Eng. after 1830, though its adoption was long opposed. (See below.) Recent extravagances in the adoption of a sentimental archaism as the ideal of beauty have still further removed æsthetic and its derivatives from their etymological and purely philosophical meaning. The pronunciations esþe·tik, ɪsþe·tik, esþī·tik, ɪsþī·tik, are all in use; the second is at present most common in London.]

¶ The following quotations illustrate the history of the word:

1838 Penny Cycl. I. 156 Æsthetics (Æsthetik) is the designation given by German writers to a branch of philosophical inquiry, the object of which is a philosophical theory of the beautiful. 1838 Philol. Museum 369 Beautiful and ugly depend on principles of taste, which it would be very convenient to designate by an adjective .. Some English writers have adopted the term esthetical. This has not however yet become an established English word .. Perception in general is something very different from that peculiar and complex modification of it which takes cognizance of the beauties of poetry and art. Esthetics would naturally designate the doctrine of perception in general, and might be wanted as a technical term for that purpose. By the Kantian school, indeed, esthetic is used to denote that branch of metaphysics which contains the laws of perception .. As an additional reason for hesitating before we adopt esthetic, it may be noticed that even in Germany it is not yet established beyond contest. 1842 GWILT Encycl. Architect. 673 There has lately grown into use in the arts a silly pedantic term under the name of Æsthetics .. it is however one of the metaphysical and useless additions to nomenclature in the arts in which the German writers abound. 1859 SIR W. HAMILTON Lect. Metaph. I. vii. 124 It is nearly a century since Baumgarten .. first applied the term Æsthetic to the doctrine which we vaguely and periphrastically denominate the Philosophy of Taste, the theory of the Fine Arts, the Science of the Beautiful, etc.,—and this term is now in general acceptation, not only in Germany, but throughout the other countries of Europe. The term Apolaustic would have been a more appropriate designation.

Fr. de loin, L. a longe, de longinquo.) On ferr appears c 1300, as = OE. feor, or a strengthening of it; (perhaps orig. an erroneous expansion of a ferr for of feor). In 14th c. both were a fer, and the force of the of being thus lost except in special connexion, the combination from a far took the place of the earlier feorran, of feor, a fer; and a fer = on-feor began to be strengthened with a following off. 3. By extension: Later, subsequent. a. with time, hours, days, years, ages, etc. (where it may be explained as ellipt. for after-coming). Frequently united to its sb. by the hyphen, which has here only a syntactical value. See After- in comb.

In numerous collocations, as after body, cabin, end, guns, ladder, masts, part, quarter, sails, timbers, yards, etc., which are frequently united by the hyphen. See After- in comb. 4.

After- in comb. is used in various relations prepositional, adverbial, and adjectival, not always easy to separate, and in various senses. In some of these the combination is very loose, the use of the hyphen being mainly syntactical, i. e. to show that the grammatical relation between after and the following word is something else than the ordinary one of preposition and object. Cf. 'After consideration I resolved to decline' with 'After-consideration has shown me that I was wrong.' 'I should know him after years had passed' with 'I know not what after-years may bring.' Otherwise it is unnecessary, as 'the events of after years.' See After a.

Agadic (ăgæ·dik), a. [f. Agada, a Latinized form of HAGGADA.] Of or belonging to the Haggada, legendary (Rabbinic).

1878 SCHILLER-SZINESSY in Academy 605/1 The beautiful, but disconnected, Agadic sayings of the ancient Rabbis. 1881 Athenæum 30 Apr. 592/3 He invokes also the Agadic expositions as a help for his system.

Again (ăge·n, ăgē·n), adv., prep., conj. Forms: 1 ongegn, ongeagn, ongeegn, ongén, onzeán, onzán; later azén, azeán, azán. South. 2 onjein, ojein, anjen, 2–4 ajein, ajen, aj6, 3 aé, 3–4 ajeyn, ajayn, ayé, 4 ayein, ajeen, 5 ayhen, ayhé, 5–6 ayen(e. North. 4 ogayn(e, ogain(e, 4–6 agayn(e, again(e, (Sc. agane, agone). Midl. 3 onnjænn, ajean, ajan, ajeon, ajon, agen, 3–4 ageyn, 5–6 ageyn(e, agein(e, agayn(e, 5–7 againe, 7–9 again, in poets agen.

[1. OE. like the cogn. langs. shows two forms: (1) ongeán, earlier ongeagn, ongeægn, ongægn, ongagn, OHG. in gagan, cf. ON. gagn sb., gagn- adv. pref.; (2) ongén, earlier ongegn, ongegn, OS. angegin, OHG. in gegin, in gegini (MHG. engegene, engein, mod. G. entgegen), ON. í gegn (Sw. igen, Dan. igjen); f. on, in + (1) gagn, (2) gegn, best explained as :— gag(a)na, gag(a)ni, variant o- and i- stems of gag(a)n. Not found in Gothic. From ongén came the various southern forms of which ayen was the type; from the earlier ongegn, ongegn, the type ayein; from agedn, the southern and midl. types ayan, ayon; from the earlier ongægn, ongægn (perh. influenced later by Norse), the northern a-gain. The late agen was a mixed form between ayen and again, and showed the common literary pronunciation even when again was written; hence it was used by the poets down to the present century (found 1834). But this is now obs., and the pronunciation (ăgē·n) from the spelling has also largely displaced (ăge·n). 2. The primary meaning of gagn, gegn seems to have been 'direct, straight' (see GAIN a. and sb., and cf. ON. gegn adj.), whence on-gegn 'in a direct line with, opposite, facing locally,' and so extended to all ideas of meeting, opposition, reversal, recurrence, repetition. Originally a separable adverbial particle, as in ongegncuman, which, when separated from the vb., became an adv. or prep. according to the construction: he cymeð agén, he him cymeð agén, he cymeð him agén, he cymeð agén him or hine. 3. As early as 1130 there arose in the south a variant with advb. genitive ajenes, againes, corrupted bef. 1400 to ajenst, against (see next word) as the prepositional form. Early in 16th c. again was restricted to the advb. use, and against alone used as prep. (and conj.). In Sc. and north Eng. where against was not adopted, again still retains all its early constructions, occasionally borrowed also by southern writers since 1525.]

†Agai·n-, [the adv.], was formerly used in many verbal combinations, which are now all obsolete; of the simple Gain- with which it varied, Gainsay is the only surviving representative. As again- was originally a movable adverbial particle, as in mod. G. entgégen-kommen, it always had the main stress, agai·n-meeting. In meaning it answered to L. re- (compounds of which now usually replace those of again-) with the following varieties:

1. Against, in opposition to; rarely opposite: again-behold, to look opposite; again-fight, to fight against; again-lay, -legge, to oppose; again-meeting, rencounter; again-renning, inroad, incursion; again-ride, to ride against; again-spreng(en, to besprinkle, bespatter; again-weight, -wiȝte, counterweight; again-wince, to kick against; again-witness, to witness against; again-withstand, to resist. 2. Any 'painful swelling,' 'ulcer,' or 'sore,' under, about, around the toe- or finger-nail; in J. and subseq. Dicts. identified with whitlow. [This change of explanation seems due to pseudo-etymology; whether confusion with Fr. 'angonailles, botches, (pocky) bumps, or sores,' Cotgr., or med. L. anghiones, anguinalia, carbuncles, contributed the 'ulcers' or 'sores' is uncertain; but -nail, misinterpreted, fixed the locality. The further identification with whitlow (in the Dicts.) seems due to collating the Gr. name of the latter παρονυχία (f. παρ' beside + ὄνυχ- nail) with ag-nail (quasi ag-at + nail). Ash explains agnail as 'a whitlow, paronychia,' and paronychia as 'a perpetual sore under the root of the nail, a whitlow.']

3. A 'hang-nail'; see quot. [Hang-nail, given by Halliwell as a dialect word, is evidently like the Sc. equivalent anger-nail (ANGER = irritation, inflammation), a corruption of ang-nail, putting a plausible meaning into it. That is, ang-nail, dialectally pronounced hang-nail, was explained as 'hanging' or detached nail. This explanation of agnail appears first in Bailey 1737 (ed. 1736 having only sense 2); the form hang-nail is in Craig 1847, and is now commoner in London than agnail.]

1740 BAILEY, Agnail: a sore slip of skin at the root of a nail. 1758 DYCHE & PARDON, Agnail; the sorgness that arises from the stripping up the flesh into thin slices at the bottom and corners of the nails. 1847 HALLIWELL, Agnail, a hang-nail, either on the finger or toe. Haugnails, small pieces of partially separated skin about the roots of the finger-nails. Various dialects. 1879 *Syd. OFr. air (Pr. air, aire, Sp. aire, Pg. ar, It. aire, aere):—L. āer-em, a. Gr. ἀήρ, ἄέρ-α, f. ἀ-ειν, ἀ-ημι (ἀε-) to blow, breathe. (Mod. It. has largely substituted aria:—L. āerea adj. for aere. Cf. Florio 1598 'Aere (aire, aira) the aire. Also, an aspect, countenance, cheere, a look or apparance in the face of man or woman. Also, a tune or aire of a song or ditty.' 'Aria, as aere, the aire.') Br. III. IV. did not arise from I. in Eng. but were adopted c 1400 from Fr. air = apparence extérieure, manière d'être, also suite de tons et de notes qui composent un chant, the connexion of which with atmospheric air is disputed.

1. Littré makes them two words, identifying air, manner, with OFr. aire 'area, open place, ARDE' q.v. (which was occasionally masc.) through the chain of ideas 'nest, stock, family, family character, derived manner,' comparing phrases like faucon de bon aire, hawk of a good sort (stock, aerie); but no formal connexion can be traced between OFr. aire and mod. Fr. air, while OFr. aire never had the sense of 'external appearance,' which is moreover quite a late sense of mod. Fr. air (end of 16th c.). Diez, after Burguy, inclines to identify the two senses, through the ideas of 'air, breath, spirit, character, manner,' comparing the range of L. spiritus, originally 'breath, air.' 2. It seems probable that the sense of 'manner' was adopted in Fr. from It. in which it is of old standing (see Florio above). Diez says that the Pr. di bon aire (Fr. de bon aire) was adopted in It., and aire treated as the native aere, aire, aria, whence di buon' aria; hence it is not impossible that the development of senses supposed by Littré, may have taken place in It. and thence been transferred in 16th c. to Fr. air. 3. But it is more probable that there was no confusion with aire = aerie, and that the idea of manner—'external manner, appearance, mien,' rather than 'innate character'—is a simple extension of the idea of the 'enveloping or affecting atmosphere special to a place, or situation' as when one is said to carry with him the 'air of the office' (Fr. air du bureau), or to catch 'the air of the court,' Shaks. (see below; cf. La Bruyere 'L'air de cour est contagieux, il se prend à Versailles, comme l'accent normand à Rouen') which Littré himself refers to 'atmosphere,' and which is not separable from 'an air of gentility, of truth,' etc. This would also best accord with Br. IV. undoubtedly of It. origination, aere, aria, (see Florio above), here translating L. modus 'manner,' also 'musical mode, metre, measure, melody.']

4. By extension of the strict architectural meaning, used also for: a. Any division of a church.

1762 H. Walpole Vertue's Anecd. Painting (1786) III. 106 A pillar in the middle isle of the church. 1789 Mrs. Piozzi France & It. II. 100 Warwick Castle would be contained in its middle aisle. 1835 Whewell Gothic Churches (ed. 2) 96 Among the liberties taken with language..I should mention the employment of the word 'aisle' for the central space, nave or choir, as well as for the lateral spaces of a building. 1836 Parker Gloss. Arch. s.v., Many writers of authority apply the word Isle to the central as well as the lateral compartments. Thus Brown Willis [a 1760] has 'middle Isle' repeatedly, and even describes the Cathedral Church of Man as consisting of two single Isles crossing each other. 1861 Nicholson Annals of Kendal 42 The church..consists of the nave, chancel, and four side aisles, so that it consists of five open aisles.

b. (By confusion with Alley) A passage in a church between the rows of pews or seats.

1732-42 Bailey, Isles, Certain straight Passages between Pews within a Church. 1755 Johnson, 'Aisle [Thus written by Addison, but perhaps improperly, since it seems deducible only from either aile a wing, or allée a path, and is therefore to be written aile.] The walks in a church or wings of a quire.' 1766 Goody Two-Shoes (1881) 55, I then walked up and down all the Isles of the Church. 1836 E. B. Denison Ch. Build. iii. 113 An aisle is.., a wing, not a passage, as people seem to imagine who talk of the 'middle aisle' of a church. 1871 Congreg. Year-bk. 410 The aisles and lobbies of the church are laid in tiles.

[OE. īggað, īgeoð was perh. a dim. of īeg, īg island (though the ordinary power of -að was to make abstr. nouns, as in huntað hunting). The subsequent phonetic history is obscure: the normal descendant of īggað would be ieth (cf. flieth); the vowel of ME. eyt might arise from an OE. variant īgað, as in īg isle for īg (cf. also ON. eið 'peninsula,' in Shetland eid 'a tongue of land'); but the t is unexplained; the later -et, and mod. -ot, are artificial spellings after islet (MFr. islette) and mod.Fr. îlot.] An islet or small isle; especially one in a river, as the aits or eyots of the Thames.

Prof. Skeat (Append.) gives a suggestion of Magnussen, comparing the earliest known forms with Icel. keng-boginn, -it, 'crooked' (Vigfusson), lit. 'bent staple-wise, or in a horse-shoe curve'; other suggestions are a cambok in the manner of a crooked stick (ME. cambok, med. L. cambūca, see CAMMOCK); a cam bow in a crooked bow. None of these satisfies all conditions.]

[The difficulty as to a-cambok, a cam bow, is that no forms of the word show cam-, from which the earliest are the most remote. The Icel. keng-boginn comes nearer the form, but there is no evidence that it had the special sense of a-kimbo, and none that the latter ever had the general sense of 'crooked.' It also postulates an early Eng. series of forms like heng-bowe* or heng-bowed*, heng-bow*, ahengbow*, quite unknown and unaccounted for.]

Al, obs. form of ALL, retained in comp. in albeit, almighty, almost, alone, already, although, always.

Al- pref.[1] The assimilated form of L. ad- to, before l. In OFr. reduced to a-, as in alier, for which however al- was often restored as an 'etymological' spelling in 14-15th c. in Fr. and Eng. In modern words adopted or formed from Latin the al- is always retained, as allegation, alliterate. Sometimes erroneously for a- in other words as a.l)lay.

Al- pref.[2] The Arabic article the, retained as an essential part of the word in various words of Arabic origin, adopted in Eng. as alcohol, alcove, alcoran, algebra, alkali, almagest, almanac, etc.

-al suffix, of adjs. and sbs. I. adj. 1. repr. L. -āl-em (-ālis, -āle, stem -āli-) adj. suff. = 'of the kind of, pertaining to,' varying in some words with -ār-em, the form always used when l preceded; thus tāl-, quāl-, nātāl-, ōrāl-; ālār-, stellār-, regulār-; linecāl- and linedr-. In words that survived, -ālem became in OFr. and hence in early Eng. -el, as mortālem, mortel. But, to some extent in Fr. and entirely in Eng. this was afterwards refashioned after L., as -al, on the analogy of which L. adjs. in -ālis and Fr. in -el have since been englished without limit. 2. The number of these adjs. in -ālis has been immensely increased in med. and mod. L.; and in the mod. Rom. langs. and E. this has become a suffix addable to any L. sb., as seen in agmin-al, bas-al, cordi-al, documental, margin-al, nation-al, pred-al, circumstanti-al, constitution-al, denomination-al, longitudin-al, proportion-al, providenti-al, prudenti-al, antipestilenti-al, none of which are found in ancient L. Following L. precedent (as in boreāl-em, hebdomadāl-em, theātrāl-em) -al is also suffixed to Gr. sbs., as in baptism-al, cathedr-al, coloss-al, chor-al, octagon-al, patriarch-al. 3. In L., secondary adjs. in -ālem were formed on other adjs., esp. when these were used substantively, as in æqu-um æquāl-em, annu-um annuāl-em, diurn-um diurnāl-em, infern-um infernāl-em, vern-um, vernāl-em. This process has been greatly extended in the mod. langs., esp. in E. where -al (like -ous) is a living formative, freely applied to L. adjs. in -eus, -ius, -uus, -nus, -is, and other endings, to give them a more distinctively adj. form; thus, aere-al, corpore-al, funere-al, senatori-al, continu-al, individu-al, perpetu-al, eternal, paternal, celestial, terrestri-al, magnific-al. This is extended to Gr. adjs. in -κός, -σειδής, which also frequently gave substantives (music, tactics, rhomboid), so that, as adj. suffixes, -acal, -ical, -oidal occur earlier in E. than the simple -ac, -ic, -oid; when the two coexist, as in comic-al, tragic-al, historic-al, that in -ic, etc. means 'of or belonging to' the thing, that in -ical 'relating to, dealing with, indirectly or remotely connected with' the thing, as a historic answer, a historical treatise, a comic paper, a comical idea. See -AC, -IC, -OID. Other suffixes are also added, as in cent-al-ly, -ize, -ization, formal-ity.

II. sb. 4. Adjs. in -al- in various genders and numbers were used substantively in L., thus rivāl-is, annāl-es, animal, tribūnal, sponsāli-a, Baccānāli-a. Many of these have been adopted in E., directly or through Fr., as rival, annals, animal, Bacchanals, penetralia, Saturnalia; and the number has been increased by the mod. sb. use of many which were only adj., or did not exist in L., as cardinal, principal, moral, oval, signal, regimentals, canonicals. 5. Nouns in -ālia (neut. pl.) which survived into OFr. became -aille (fem. sing.) with pl. -ailles, adopted in ME., as -aylle, -aille, later -aile, -al, as L. sponsāli-a, OFr. espousaille-s, E. spousaile-s; L. battālia*, OFr. bataille, Eng. bataille, -aile, -ail, now battle. On this analogy, -aille, -ail, -al became an Anglo-Fr. and E. formative of nouns of action on vbs. of Fr. or L. origin, as in AFr. arrivaille arrival; so of later formation (some quite modern) 'revival, survival, approval, removal, avowal, renewal; acquittal, committal, transmittal, refutal, recital, requital; dismissal, perusal, refusal, carousal, rehearsal, reversal, revisal, reprisal, surprisal; dis-, inter-, pro-, re-, sup-, trans-posal; trial, denial, decrial'; occas. also on native final-accented vbs. as 'bestowal, betrothal, beheadal.' Bridal and burial simulate this ending, but have a different origin; yet they have probably aided the prevalence of these nouns of action in -al in mod. Eng.

It. allarme = all' arme! 'To (the) arms!' orig. the call summoning to arms, and thus, in languages that adopted it, a mere interjection; but soon used in all as the name of the call or summons. Erroneously taken in the 17th c. for an English combination all arm! and so written; cf. similar treatment of alamode and alamort. From the earliest period there was a variant alarum due to rolling the r in prolonging the final syllable of the call, now restricted to an alarm-signal, as the peal or chime of a warning bell or clock, or the mechanism producing it. Gr. χημία, χημεία, found (c. 300) in the Decree of Diocletian against 'the old writings of the Egyptians, which treat of the χημία (transmutation) of gold and silver'; hence the word is explained by most as 'Egyptian art,' and identified with χημία, Gr. form (in Plutarch) of the native name of Egypt (land of Khem or Khemē, hieroglyphic Khmi, 'black earth,' in contrast to the desert sand). If so, it was afterwards etymologically confused with the like-sounding Gr. χῦσία, pouring; infusion, f. χυ- pf. stem of χέ-ειν to pour, cf. χῦμός juice, sap, which seemed to explain its meaning; hence the Renascence spelling alchymia and chymistry. Mahn (Etym. Unt. 69) however concludes, after an elaborate investigation, that Gr. χῦμεία was probably the original, being first applied to pharmaceutical chemistry, which was chiefly concerned with juices or infusions of plants; that the pursuits of the Alexandrian alchemists were a subsequent development of chemical study, and that the notoriety of these may have caused the name of the art to be popularly associated with the ancient name of Egypt, and spelt χημεία, χημία, as in Diocletian's decree. From the Alexandrians the art and name were adopted by the Arabs, whence they returned to Europe by way of Spain. 5. Organ. Chem. An extensive class of compounds, of the same type as spirit of wine, composed of carbon, hydrogen, and oxygen, some of which are liquid and others solid.

They may be regarded as water (HOH) with one of its hydrogen atoms replaced by a hydro-carbon radical as Methyl (CH_3), Ethyl (C_2H_5), Propyl (C_3H_7), Butyl (C_4H_9), Amyl (C_5H_{11}) etc., according to the character of which, the alcohol is monocarbon or methyl, dicarbon or ethyl, tricarbon or propyl, etc.; or as paraffins (Methane CH_4, Ethane C_2H_6, Propane C_3H_8, etc. with one or more of their hydrogen atoms replaced by equivalent atoms of hydroxyl (HO), according to the number of which atoms replaced, the alcohol is monatomic, diatomic, triatomic, etc. Tricarbon alcohols are primary or secondary, tetracarbon and higher alcohols are primary, secondary, or tertiary, according as the carbon atom united to the hydroxyl atom is also directly in contact with one, two, three other carbon atoms of the molecule. Isomeric alcohols are such as have the same percentage composition but a different arrangement of atoms in the complex molecule, and are physically different substances. The number of possible alcohols is apparently unlimited. [This extension of the name to a genus was made by Dumas and Péligot in 1834 5, in pointing out the analogy between wood-spirit (Methyl alcohol) and spirit of wine; in 1836, they identified another member of the series in ethal (Cetyl alcohol); in 1844, Cahours found another (Amyl alcohol) in Fusel oil; after which the recognition of 'alcohols' went on rapidly.]

Common vinous or vinic) Alcohol (see prec. sense) is a primary, monatomic, dicarbon or ethyl alcohol, C_2H_6O, and may be considered as water, in which one atom of hydrogen is replaced by an atom of ethyl, or C_2H_5; thus $C_2H_5.OH$ instead of H.OH.

The aldor (or ealdor) was thus a natural rank, the aldormann its political equivalent. But the distinction necessarily faded away; the Northumbrian and Mercian Gospel glosses constantly have aldorman for the WSax. ealdor, and in WSax. itself ealdorman differed from ealdor solely in its more restricted and technical use.

1. A senior, signor, superior, ruler; a noble or person of high rank.

In OE. the special title of one exercising authority under the king, over a former kingdom, as Mercia, a district, or county; a viceroy or lord-lieutenant. Used also to translate Lat. princeps, subregulus, optimus, satrapa, dux, comes, præpositus; and, in a more general sense, many other words, as pontifex, architriclinus, presbyter, senator, etc. The special title was mostly supplanted by earl under the Danish dynasty; the more general sense continued for several centuries, and gave rise to 2 and 3. For the OE. title, recent historical writers have used the late West-Saxon and Kentish ealdorman; but the general OE. form was aldormann.

1. An intoxicating liquor made from an infusion of malt by fermentation. Various ingredients have at various times been added to impart flavour; at present hops or other bitters are in use.

Ale and beer seem originally to have been synonymous. The Alvismál says 'öl heitir með mönnum, en með 'Asum bjórr.' It is called 'ale' among men, and among the gods 'beer.' After the introduction into England of 'the wicked weed called hops' (Retn. to Edw. VI's Parlt.) c 1584, 'beer' was commonly hopped; at present 'beer' is in the trade the generic name for all malt liquors, 'ale' being specifically applied to the paler coloured kinds, the malt for which has not been roasted or burnt; but the popular application of the two words varies in different localities.

3. Any substance possessing the characteristics of soda, i.e. a caustic or acrid taste, the power of forming a soap with oil, and of effervescing with or neutralizing acids.

In early chemistry alkali was supposed to be a specific substance, which existed, Fixed (in soda, potash), Volatile (in ammonia). Duhamel (1736) showed that there were distinct alkalis, and these were distinguished as Mineral alkali (soda), Vegetable alkali (potash), Animal alkali (ammonia).

1802 IMISON Sc. & Art II. 168 The alcali is one of the chief articles of expense used in bleaching. 1876 URE Dict. Arts I. 71 Of alkali manufactured in the United Kingdom the following quantities were exported. Ibid. III. 861 Before the passing of the Alkali Act, or at least before the introduction of the Alkali Bill into Parliament.

6. Mod. Chem. A series of the compounds called BASES, with well-marked characters, analogous to, and including soda, potash, and ammonia; they are highly soluble in water, producing caustic or corrosive solutions, which neutralize strong acids, turn vegetable yellows to brown, reds to blue, and purples to green; in the decomposition of a compound they are relatively electro-positive.

'In its most restricted, but most usual sense, it is applied to four substances only: hydrate of potassium (potash), hydrate of sodium (soda), hydrate of lithium (lithia), and hydrate of ammonium (which may be supposed to exist in the aqueous solution of ammonia). In a more general sense it is applied to the hydrates of the so-called alkaline earths (baryta, strontia, and lime), and to a large number of organic substances both natural and artificial, [called] alkaloids and ammonium-bases. The first four bodies are sometimes spoken of as alkalis proper, when it is wished specially to distinguish them from the other bases.' WATTS Dict. Chem. Hence, Fixed or Mineral alkalis, the hydrates of the metals above-named; Vegetable alkalis, the alkaloids; Organic alkalis, all the organic bases containing nitrogen, whether of vegetable or animal origin.

Chem.* (1879) 117 The relations of the alkalis to other substances lead to the representation of them as hydrates, or as water in which half the hydrogen is replaced by a metal or compound radicle. The earliest addition made . . to the old list of alkalis was morphia . . This was the first organic alkali, or alkaloid, which became known. 1875 URE Dict. Arts I. 71 Modern chemists regard all organic alkalis as derived from the type ammonia or oxide of ammonium.

C. adv. 1. General construction.

1. All adj. is often separated from the sb. which it defines, by an auxiliary vb. or clause, and so appears to refer to the predicate; as 'Zion our mother is all wofull,' where all, originally an attribute or complement of Zion, comes to be viewed as qualifying woful = altogether woful.

As these derivative vbs. were at length rarely used without all, the fact that the to- belonged to the vb. was lost sight of, and it was written separate, or even joined to all, as *al to-torn, al to torn, alto torn. III. All- in comb.

Combinations with all- as first element have existed from the earliest times, and have become, since c 1600, unlimited in number. In some groups the combination is merely syntactic, though even there individual instances of long standing have become true compounds; cf. the gradation in all alive, all-important, all-powerful, almighty. The stress is not on all except in a few real compounds as a·lways, a·lso. On these combinations as well as on simple phrases, derivatives are freely formed in which the loose union or non-union of the original elements is cemented by the formative process, so that all is no longer merely in syntactic combination with the rest of the word; thus all-pervadingness, all-eyed, cannot be analysed as all + pervadingness, all + eyed, but only as (all-pervading) + -ness, (all eyes) + -ed. The following general classification contains I. Simple combinations; II. Derivatives formed on these, and on phrases. Words in SMALL CAPITALS are treated in their alphabetical place in the sequel.

I. Simple combinations.

1. adject. with sb., as ALL-FOUR(S, -HAIL, -HALLOWS, -MIGHT, -NIGHT, -SAINTS, -SOULS, -SPICE (and their derivatives); all-power, omnipotence; all-wisdom.

2. adject. with adv. (formerly an oblique case of sb. or pron.), as ALGATE, ALWAYS, ALLWHERE, -WHITHER.

3. substant. (genit.) with sb. = 'of all, universal,' as ALL-FATHER; all-monarch, -parent, -soul; esp. as obj. gen. with verbal agents, when there is an accompanying ppl. form in -ing (see 7), as all-commander (cf. all-commanding), -creator, -destroyer, -encompasser, -giver, -maker, -seer, -sustainer, etc.

5. advb. with sb., as ALL-BONE; all-heart (i.e. wholly heart), a name of the elm tree; all-sayer. And in attrib. phrases such as all-rail, wholly by rail, all-slavery, all-talk, wholly, altogether (given to) talk, all-wool, wholly of wool.

1567 MAPLET Greene Forest 41 b, The Elme .. is called of some All heart. 1624 BARGRAVE Serm. 21 Our Saviour .. found some all-sayers and no-doers, so others that would outdoe all faith. 1833 GEN. 6. advb. with adj., = 'wholly, altogether, infinitely.' About twenty of these combinations are found in OE. including eall-beorht, -gearo, -geleáflic,

-grēne, -gylden, -hālig, -hwīt, -īren, -īsig, -mihtig, -nacod, -nīwe, -riht, -seolcen, -tearo, -weald, -wdrlīc. Of these ALL-HOLY, and AL-MIGHTY, survived into ME. and were reinforced from time to time by -WITTY, -worthy, -wise, -GOOD, -merciful, -just. Since 1600, the number of these has been enormously extended, all- having become a possible prefix, in poetry at least, to almost any adj. of quality. Thus, all-able, -beauteous, -bitter, -black, -bountiful, -brilliant, -complete, -constant, -content, -divine, -dreadful, -earnest, -eloquent, -essential, -evil, -fair, -glorious, -golden, -gracious, -holy, -important, -just, -lavish, -lovely, -merciful, -peaceful, -perfect, -potential, -praiseworthy, -prolific, -puissant, -pure, -rapacious, -righteous, -sacred, -substantial, -true, -various, -vast, -wondrous.
